His Few Parting Words to His Son Old Sol Grayson was long regarded as the most noted infidel in Arkansaw. His pious neighbors were often shocked by his unreverential expressions, and the superstitious were afraid to pass the house at night or during dark, cloudy weather. One day the news that old Sol had been stricken down with rheumatism of the heart spread around. People left their plows and shops and hurried to the bedside of the sufferer, hurried to the bedside of the sufferer, not particularly through sympathy, but because they wanted to witness the old man's violent struggle with the devil. "Ah, old man," the neighbors had often remarked, "we want to be present when you die. You'll take water then, old man." The old man would reply that he had never taken much water during life, and that he didn't think he would life, and that he didn't think he would lose his appetite for something stronger at life's close.

Well, the time had come and the people gathered around. The old man seemed to be suffering greatly.
"How do you feel, old man?" asked the superintendent of the neighborhood

"Pretty rough," and he drew up his face and squinted his eyes in pain.
"Old gentleman, you are dying. A few more moments and you will be beyond the philosophy of earth. You have yond the philosophy of earth. You have not believed in a hell; you have lived as though you never expected to meet the devil, and now we ask you to try and reflect."

"You are right," said the old man. "You are right, my life has been a terrible mistake," and calling his son to his bedside he said: "John, I'm going."
"Yes, father," replied the boy.

"It is right that I should give a few parting words to you." The visitors pressed forward and leaned over. "No man should die without leaving advice to his son." He was silent for a mo-ment, and the superintendent, fearing that he might die before the words of advice and repentance were uttered,

"But what were you going to say to your son?" "Yes, I had almost forgotten it. John

Is Oscar Wilde a Humbug?

"Argus," in Land and Water, writes: The esthetic school has fallen into disrepute in society of late, owing in some degree to the doings of its chief apostle in America. The common opinion of Mr. Oscar Wilde is very wide of the truth. He is not the puling sentimentalist that he postures on the plat-form or appears in the drawings of Du Maurier. He is as shrewd and practical a youth as any I know. He came to London to make a reputation and set about it in a business-like fashion. Finding the ordinary methods of acquiring it slow and tedious he devised a method of his own, created the aesthetic school, and in less than a year became one of the most talked-of men in London. Now he is in America amassing a fortune, and contemplating—rather dubiously—marriage with a rich heiress. If this is folly, there is method in it."
